

Support individual right to die legislation.

Why would any terminally ill human not want a law legalizing their right to determine their own end of life at a time and place of their choosing?

What possible argument can be made by healthy legislators for extending the lives of the terminally ill, who are ready to die, who are in a physical, mental and emotional place the law-maker has yet to experience?

Needless suffering and financial expense at the end of one's life is just cruel. Medically or chemically extending one's life past the point of no return, beyond the wishes of the individual, is the final slap-in-the-face, the last personal indignity inflicted on the person who is ready to pass on.

When faced with terminal illness; determining one's own time to die offers the dying one last opportunity for self determination in their lifetime.
